Wifi qr code scanner for pc online

I must admit, I have not been quite as kind of trying them: they look like the mobile phone regulations that square inklotus. They call you from the newspaper ads, packaging, and the hanging signs in the conference hall. They invite you to take a picture in exchange for your mobile phone's purpose and some kind of a clear promise of digital content. Next time I stand around to do nothing, no email to send, no one to call, I'll try a QR code. But after the worry that I would never come that day, I took the opportunity to talk to a guru on the subject. Laura has been spending 15 years on the well-known edge of mobile technology. He was one of the employee number one Mobile Marketing Association (MMA), sits on the boards of several mobile technology firms, and his CEO's technology, is under a QR code. The Only Creative Event That Was Held In France By Loora was back at the Keynes Sher International Festival of last year some of the best mobile marketing campaigns of the past year, and I had the opportunity to ask him about qr codes. Here are my main steps from a short list of Ambarasangal simplicity questions. Why are QR Codes Square? Traditional codes are one-dimension (read as a wire of dashes), while QR codes are two-dimension (read horizontally and vertically). This allows them to transfer more information. Why is square better? Although a traditional barcode can give you a line of data (for example, domain name), qr codes can give you two lines of data (for example, domains and an index code). It gives you or your brand manager a lot of flexibility. If one month you want to send people to your fourth of July promotion and next you heat up the summer event, you don't have to reprint your QR codes; you just change what index points are. You can change the content every day if you want. An added benefit: Since QR codes read four points instead of two points, they save more wear and tear. What do companies use for them? Companies still do not fully understand what they can do with QR codes. They slapped on packaging people to visit their mobile website. Now we're starting to use for them to scan here to process calls, like to be subscribers and get a special discount! They demand that the process dramatically increases the rate of response. But with any emerging technology, companies are taking longer than necessary to learn about using QR codes, which gives us the next clear question. Should companies use them for them? QR codes are starting to use more cleverness, as a way to increase real estate on packaging. You can scan and immediately scan compatibility requirements, eyeglasses, instructions, etc. This means that you don't have to waste valuable packaging space on boring text. We're seeing scan video protesters and products Do. As we can approach a world in which we each have a camera enabled smartphone, we can see the full experience of packaging a product change Blend like a matrix of real and virtual. Should you use QR codes? I was surprised by his answer . I thought he would be an embarrassing QR code advocate. It depends, he says. First you want to think about your goals and then you think about achieving these goals whether marketing and media support. If your target customers do not have a tech premium or a mobile phone, QR codes will not help much. You need to understand what you are targeting. The ability to dramatically change the lower-level codes is how your customers experience and interact with your products. But the date we get will take the possible time. These three interdependent agents will need to process the radial shifts: technology, companies, and customers. This is the process that made our adoption of DVR, CD, and fax machine. To take my flight off la as I wrote, for example, I went a huge ad with a QR code. I thought about scan it to stop and see what happens, but it was midnight, and I had a half-hour drive before me, so I just went away. Good news for you, out, that wave, slow, is clearly going on and it creates an opportunity for you to first get it over if you're going to be next to your competition.
